China – August data shows persistent split

15 September 2026

Dr. Henry Hao^{AC}

China's August activity data delivered a split verdict. Industrial output beat expectations, but retail sales, investment, and construction deteriorated further, reinforcing our view that the structural imbalances are widening. The data confirmed that external-facing sectors continue to carry a domestic economy that remains unable to generate self-sustaining demand.

Factory output surprises, but the gap widens

Industrial production rose 5.2% yoy (Bloomberg consensus: 4.8%) vs 4.5% in July. The beat reflects a partial seasonal recovery as weather disruptions from earlier summer typhoons faded, and as infrastructure-linked manufacturing activity picked up modestly. Yet the headline strength in output sits in contrast to the deterioration in consumption and investment, underscoring a factory sector that is producing into an environment of weakening domestic absorption. The divergence between supply-side resilience and demand-side fragility has become the defining feature of China's 2026 economic narrative (Chart 1).

Consumer spending remains subdued

Retail sales grew just 0.4% yoy in August (Bloomberg consensus: 0.8%), slipping further from 0.6% in July. The reading extends a pattern of near-stagnant consumption that has persisted through most of 2026. Online retail sales offered a marginal counterpoint, rising 4.6% year-to-date, but household goods sales grew only 1.1%, pointing to continued reluctance on big-ticket discretionary spending. The surveyed urban unemployment rate ticked up to 5.3% in August from 5.2% in July, adding another headwind to household confidence at a time when income expectations remain fragile.

Investment contraction deepens across the board

Fixed-asset investment (FAI) fell 7.2% year-to-date through August (Bloomberg consensus: 7.1%), worsening from the 6.7% decline through July. The weakness was broad-based across all three major components. Manufacturing investment fell 6.1% yoy. Infrastructure investment declined 6.9% yoy, though a recovery in coming months is likely as local government special bond issuance accelerates into year-end, channeling fresh fiscal resources into project spending. Real estate investment was the deepest drag, contracting 19.9% year-to-date, extending its decline and weighing on the aggregate figure (Chart 2).

Chart 2 - Investment contraction deepens before likely infrastructure recovery

Broad infrastructure investments include investment in power grid in addition to investments in transport, storage, and utility

Pre-sale reform risks further slump before stabilization

A granular look at construction activity reveals deterioration across every metric. New construction starts fell 24.2% year-to-date by floor area, new home sales by value declined 13.1% to CNY4.2trn, and funds raised by property developers dropped 21% yoy. These indicators signal that the pipeline of future construction activity will remain constrained even if demand-side conditions stabilize. To put the scale of the downturn in perspective, construction sales, starts, completions, and investment now stand at just 43%, 22%, 53%, and 49% of their respective 2021 peak levels, illustrating the full depth of the sector's multi-year contraction (Chart 3).

The most consequential structural development came in late August, when three government bodies jointly issued rules requiring developers to complete the main structural frame of a residential building before initiating presales. In the near term, the requirement to fund and build ahead of sales will force developers to delay groundbreaking on new projects until alternative financing is secured, putting further downward pressure on construction starts. Over the medium term, completions should become more reliable and delivery risk should diminish, but the transition period is likely to keep new starts depressed well into 2027 before any meaningful recovery in construction volumes can take hold.

Persistent economic divergence demands policy action

China's widening economic divergence is forcing Chinese policymakers into a corner as the final months of 2026 loom. With consumption, investment, credit, and the property sector all underperforming, the case for additional targeted measures is building. Market attention will now shift to whether the State Council or the PBoC signals any further adjustment to the policy stance before year-end, particularly given that the full-year growth target remains at risk of being missed without a material improvement in domestic demand through Q4.
